

I have been publishing and faxing a technical newsletter out to the same small scientific community for 5 years. My livelihood depends on these newsletters that have a small amount of advertising in them. I have personally spoken to each and every one of these people; I know them well enough to also know that they will remember to fax back an authorization after about six to nine months after I have been driven out of business. Certainly this regulation was not intended to damage small struggling entities with long established contacts like mine. Faxing has been our only economical way of surviving in our business climate. I am pleading that you please reconsider this act before any irreversable damage has been done.

Sincerely,

Don Skaggs
